This chapter marks the beginning of Joseph's journey from favored son to a figure of suffering and eventual redemption. Readers should watch for the themes of favoritism, jealousy, and divine providence, as well as the significance of Joseph's dreams which foreshadow future events. The chapter sets the stage for God's sovereign plan unfolding through human actions, emphasizing both human responsibility and divine orchestration.

Context

Genesis 37 is situated within the larger Joseph narrative, which spans chapters 37 through 50. It follows the story of Jacob and his twelve sons, focusing here on Joseph, Jacob's eleventh son by Rachel. The immediate literary context shows a family struggling with favoritism and rivalry, set against the backdrop of the covenant promises given to Abraham and his descendants. The historical frame is the patriarchal period, where family lineage and inheritance are crucial. Key figures in this chapter include Jacob, Joseph, and his brothers, with the setting primarily in Canaan and later moving toward Egypt. The chapter introduces the tension that will lead to Joseph's exile, which ultimately serves God's covenantal purposes.

Outline

and jealousy to betrayal and deception, setting in motion the larger redemptive story.
